The potential for wind power in Idaho continues to grow and to help people realize the possibilities, the Idaho Energy Division of the Idaho Department of Water Resources has launched a new updated website to help answer questions.

Idaho ranks 13th in the nation for its wind power development potential, be it large commercial opportunities or small-scale projects powering individual homes and businesses.

The Energy Division's website: www.idahowind.org is packed with a lot of helpful information including maps showing the best places for wind development, and where to go for expert opinions, equipment and even financing.

The site also includes several links that will prove very useful for those researching the exciting opportunity wind power provides. "This should help Idahoans start to access their potential to harness wind and both make and save money," Wind Power Coordinator Gerald Fleischman said.
